Adjust Clocks & Driving Habits, Too

RICHMOND- Not only will Virginians have to adjust their clocks this Sunday (Oct. 28), they'll have to adjust their driving habits too, according to John T. Hanna, director, Highway Safety Division of Virginia.

The switch from daylight savings to eastern standard time at 2 a.m. Sun., Oct. 28, means that darkness will arrive an hour sooner. Motorists must be alerted to their reduced visibility.

"Although only one third of the total traffic volume occurs at night, half of all fatal crashes happen during hours of reduced visibility," he continued.

Hanna suggested clean windshields and headlights to improve night driving.

"Dirty windshields can distort motorists' vision, which is already reduced at night. it is important to keep head and taillights clean too. If these are dirty, it cuts down on the driver's field of vision and makes it harder for approaching motorists and pedestrians to see the car."

Hanna advised motorists to turn their headlights on at dusk and dawn, but warned against driving with parking lights on. Their smaller size misleads over drivers into thinking a car is father away than it really is.

Last year in Virginia, 563 fatal crashes occurred during hours of darkness and 28 at dusk.

Am I Covered?

Q- I own a small store with two large regular plate glass windows facing the street. I have glass coverage in my insurance. If one or both windows are broken, will my insurance pay to replace them with tempered safety glass as now required by law? The new glass costs 50% more than regular plate glass.

A: The policy provisions allow for the repair or replacement of plate glass of "like kind and quality". The fact that building codes require a different type of glass to be used in replacement does not affect the insurance company's limit of liability. It might be noted that coverage for this particular claim situation can be purchased at an additional cost, but it is not afforded as a standard provison of a package policy.

Q: If a tree in my yard falls on a neighbor's fence, will my Homeowners policy pay the damage?

A: The determination of this claim would require proof of negligence on the part of the Homeowner whose tree fell. If, in fact, it can be proven that the tree represented a hazard to the neighbor, struck by lightening, decayed, etc., the property damage coverage of the personal liability provisions of the Homeowners policy would pay the damages up to the limit of liability provided by the policy.

Q: I was involved recently in an accident where fault has not yet been determined. Will my insurance company pay for me to rent another car while mine is being repaired?

A: Rental expenses Virginia Automobile not provided in case of regardless of fault; only of theft of the entire is coverage provided for expenses.
